To Whom It May Concern,

I am a grandparent of two grandchildren who are currently being home-schooled. I believe parents have the right to choose how they teach their children. The way homeschooling is delivered means parents can tailor their children's education to meet the individual needs and learning styles of each child. Parents can adapt the curriculum, teaching methods, and pacing to suit their child's strengths, help with their weaknesses, and their child's interests.

By introducing the National curriculum to homeschooling you are not taking into consideration that each child has different learning abilities and interests and you are classifying that all kids have the same learning style and interest, meaning you are taking away the child's individuality.

Yours Sincerely
