To whom it may concern I believe bringing the National Curriculum into home-schooling is a mistake and should not be allowed. Having both of my kids home schooled, I have watched my son shine, as he learns about different topics and studies all kinds of subjects. He also teaches me things about what he learns throughout his day. My daughter is thriving as well, though she requires teaching to be slowed down to help her understand and retain the information from the topics that she studies. Which she gets because of home-schooling. Looking at my children and how they are thriving and are able to learn in an environment tailored to them and their needs, I believe this is the best way for them to get a high quality education and to change this would be to the detriment of all homeschooling families, not just my own. Bringing this way of learning into homeschooling is going to affect the amount of time we as parents are giving our children and reduce the efficacy of homeschooling, as well as causing undue stress and negative impacts to any who are forced or coerced into going to a mainstream school.
