Unless deemed wards of the state, parents are the ones who make decisions in the best interests of their children. Each child is unique with unique learning abilities. Thinking that all children learn the same way regardless of age or gender is part of the problem in the current system. The government should ask themselves why parents are pulling their children out of schools?? It is a huge personal and financial sacrifice to homeschool and yet more and more families are choosing this path. Why? Government must realise that parents want their children educated and not indoctrinated. Government should stick to literacy and numeracy and let parents decide on morality and religion. Until this is the case parents, who want the best for their children, will continue to sacrifice themselves for the wellbeing of their children. Leave the homeschooling sector alone. Go spend our tax money on something worthwhile. Like fixing the current system, where students are out of control and disengaged.
