I request that the attention given to home schooling takes in to account the need for each child to have individual learning plans created by the family and driven by the child's needs. Families can educate freely without National Curriculum requirements. Literacy and numeracy has long been failing under our national curriculum requirements, so it is not wise to impose a failing model to those dedicated to the education and welfare of their children. Parents are the child's first teacher, and most important role model. In addition, the funding supplied and currently allocated from public taxation given sate school departments should follow the child to their new education environments. All taxation dollars can be redirected to the family/private tuition to be used in accomodating excellence in learning though external services, private tuition, material costs travel and course costs though the families chosen pathways. Diversity through opportunity is the way forward, creating a varied learning experience for the population will ensure creativity and self reliance in our youth. Building a strong population for the future.
