Statistics show the rapid rise in people who are not only disenchanted with the school system but are concerned enough to find the means to take on home education for their children. Many dedicated teachers struggle to meet children's needs in a system which appears to prioritise accountability for results over the wellbeing of vulnerable students in a challenging world.

Homeschoolers I've known tend to be resilient, resourceful, creative and confident. After school they have attended university, started their own business, or been employed. They are well adjusted, caring people. I can see every reason to encourage and support any carers with the capacity and dedication, to engage in the homeschooling of their children.
