Dear Committee, I am opposed to the legislation changes for home-schooling families for the following reasons: ACARA should not be held as the highest standard of education, it may suit a classroom setting but it is too rigid for home-schooling families to adhere to based on the fact that a home educator in most cases will be teaching kids from multiple age groups, at home our children relish in learning together as a family or "cohort" we cover all subjects however it would be an almost impossible task to teach multiple concepts to across age groups for all subjects as would be required if we were to be constricted by ACARA. This will not allow for quality learning, but instead pressure parents to feel rushed to cover all concepts and I fear kids could miss basic and fundamental concepts. This will be detrimental to children's education. We choose to home educate because not all children learn at the same rate and fit in the same "box". As a parent educator it is my right to make this choice. Homecoming is, and needs to continue to be a fun and enjoyable experience for families and most importantly instil a love of learning in our kids. Please listen to your home-school community. Yours Sincerely Jason Hoath [REDACTED]
