The new home schooling legislation is highly problematic. I object to its introduction. Firstly, it should be parents that are best placed to decide what is in the best interests of their children, not unelected bureaucrats. Moreover, it should be the right of parents to choose a curriculum that suits their child. The principle reason for why parents are opting for home schooling, at alarming rates, is because the bureaucrats in charge of state and national curriculums have lost their way and are no longer providing any resemblance of a quality education. It is laughable to even suggest that these same unelected bureaucrats would be placed in a position to evaluate what a quality education looks like. Do not pass this legislation. People are sick and tired of having your propaganda forced upon them.
