Submitter Comments:

Homeschooling is becoming rapidly increasingly more popular for education of children. It works well and is a very individual approach to children's learning. Children can learn so much more with one on one learning than in a class of 25+ students with many students being disruptive to other students' learning. It can be very difficult and detrimental for studious children. Homeschooling is a great option also for those with learning difficulties who can then receive the individual tuition they need and deserve. Why try to change learning that works so well and is obviously popular advantageous for so many?
