

I believe that the universal laws of creation continue to exist, regardless of religious, custom, traditional, scientific, atheist or agnostic beliefs that people have had and continue to have regarding abortion. Has anyone ever wondered about what happens to an 'aborted foetus or infant' on a spiritual level, not to mention the physical and emotional pain caused to the child and to everyone else involved, at a sub-conscious level? Upon conception of the physical, a soul and spiritual body are also connected. The developing foetus experiences emotions and feelings relating to its environment.

If child is born and is visible with our eyes and when it's life is taken, then this is considered a murder. But when a child is still "behind the scenes" as one could say, it seems to be tolerated and overlooked as such. It is hypocritical that numerous sick and underdeveloped babies are born premature where families and doctors fight believe in Pro-life and fight so hard to give them a kickstart in life, even though they may have many health problems later. It really doesn't make sense the way people think. There appears to be a denial of any emotional feelings towards abortion hence why people don't care about possible consequences, as if it's just a medical procedure. I am really shocked that abortions can take place at 22 weeks or later.

When I spoke to my local MP, he told me the reason behind decriminalising the act of abortion. I do try to understand that it is better to have these procedures done under the protection of government laws and have correct statistics. I also try to understand the difficult decision that parents are willing to make when a developing child is diagnosed as abnormal.

However, if the law is passed, it is very concerning that many more people will be able to make choices based on the wrong timing in life or the sexuality of the unborn or for whatever other reason such as a failed relationship and feel that it's okay by the law. Our society will have an imbalance of females and males, which already exist in China, India and some other countries.

Wouldn't it be more loving and ethical for a woman to continue with the pregnancy and give the child away to couples who desperately desire to adopt and love children? In Australia there is such a shortage of babies to adopt.
