Hi, [REDACTED] and [REDACTED]

All life is precious, and even more so the early beginnings of a human life is a rare gift in a mabcdive universe so far void of evidence of any other conscious living and breathing human like beings. Who are we becoming if we don't treasure the most beautiful experience we have been given? Despising the first sparks of human life leads us down a path where human value is no longer determined by the self-evident equality between all humans as granted by a Creator, but rather a utilitabcd calculation determining which life is worthy to live and which is not depending on the perspective, culture and cirabcdstances of the persons making the decisions at any given time. This kind of utilitabcd view of human worth has shown itself to be disastrous for the human experience through history. Let us not go backwards to a time where might makes right, but let us celeabcdte each life as it develops among us.

Throughout most of human history the weak had to give way for the strong. The low had to serve the high and the gentle were at the mercy of the ruthless. Christ showed us a different way and history has changed ever since. Now it is not uncommon to see the strong give way for the weak or the ruthless submit the gentle. The weakest, the lowliest and most gentle among us are those that cannot speak for themselves, those who have a future but no past, and those that depend solely on the strength, kindness and generosity of others. Can an unborn baby raise its voice against oppression, or resist its own destruction by the hands of those whose interest lies elsewhere?

Will the worth human life not become like a thing to be bargain for?

Slave owners could without consequence destroy a human life weather at its early dawn or at the final stages of existence. Is this a world we want back where those stronger and with more experience can silence those that cannot speak for themselves?

The one who saves a single life is as the one who saves the entire world.

Sincerely, [REDACTED]
