When collecting baseline data regarding prevalence of e-cigarette use, also collect data on the avenues in which e-cigarettes are acquired. For example are tobacconists selling direct to young people or are young people getting a third party to purchase or are they purchasing the product themselves online or accessing the products in the home. If you do not know the ways in which e-cigarettes are being accessed it will make it difficult to develop an effective program to prevent the use of such products. I would also recommend taking a look at the guidelines and regulations around advertising such products to young people or when manufacturers develop products that may be appealing to young people to see if further improvements could be made regarding preventative measures. Thanks for considering my comments.
