It is unfair to rescind voting rights when citizens have completed their imprisonment. Prohibiting voting after the sentence is complete unfairly prolongs the punishment for the rest of that person's life, and disincentives them from engaging in their society and governance.

The ban on political donations from property developers would create a rubber-stamp legality of bribery, and it is unfair to allow property developers such power to influence when the communities affected get no such upgrade in ability to advocate or take part in the process of development.
