The current laws associated with identifying voters is adequate. The introduction of these proposed new laws will impact most on those who are already most disadvantaged. They are also unnecessarily restrictive when there are already adequate checks and balances in place to ensure that all registered voters votes are recorded.

The introduction of this proposed new law is unwarranted and will impact on many legitimate voters without doing anything to substantial in restricting electoral fraud.

In conclusion, the amount of electoral is so small that this proposed law is unnecessary.
